EXECUTIVE SUMMARY

Radiation curing of coatings and laminations provides products with unique characteristics. These high value added or unique products have formed a base from which this technology can grow. The various systems; Electron Beam (EB), Ultraviolet (UV), Infrared (IR) and Microwave, have several perceived advantages over traditional gas or oil fired thermal processes:

- unique and high value added products
- high production speeds through rapid curing
- decreased machinery space required
- energy efficiency
- use of 100% solids coatings, to reduce or eliminate solvent emissions.
- improved safety

Secrecy within industry makes evaluations and predictions difficult, however, the total number of processing units in the United States is expected to more than double by 1990. Similar figures exist for Europe and Japan where growth rates of 10 to 20% per year are expected.

The driving force for expansion in the industry is primarily from novel products and products with improved quality. Also, higher productivity in some areas justifies the use of equipment with higher capital costs. Energy savings and pollution control have been less significant as driving forces for expansion, but increase in importance as EPA regulations come into effect and as relative costs of fossil fuels increases in relation to electricity.

Canadian converters generally follow the lead of the United States and other foreign countries, as the market in Canada is small, and by far the majority of equipment is purchased from foreign machine manufacturers.

From the large list of products which can be manufactured by radiation curing processes (see Table 5.1)[21] only those with an overall cost advantage will use the new technology. To date, only specialty products and some very large volume products exhibit this cost advantage.

Radiation curables tend to be designed for and applied to specific products, whereas thermal ovens can be used for a wide variety of products.

Care must be exercised when evaluating energy consumption of these processes to include all stages of production. The decreased energy input at the curing stage may be the result of increased energy input at another stage such as during formulation.

1. INTRODUCTION

The purpose of this study is to determine the current state-of-the-art technology of radiation curing and processing techniques with respect to the packaging and printing industries. Radiation curing involves several methods including: electron beam (EB), ultraviolet (UV), microwave and radio frequency (RF), infra-red (IR), (see Figure 1.1(1)).

Packaging converters and printers have a considerable interest in the use of these energy sources as an alternate to the presently used thermal methods of proving drying or polymerization of organic inks, coatings and adhesives. The perceived advantages are seen to be:

- more rapid curing rates
- lower operating temperatures
- possibility of using 100% solids coatings thus reducing emissions and improving safety
- potential for curing through substrates in sandwich constructions
- potential for unique or enhanced properties
- feasibility of laying down very heavy coatings
- more compact machinery
- energy savings
- ability to cross-link polymers to provide more durable and chemically resistant coatings

The conversion of electrical energy into each of the forms above has been achieved and current work is centered around improving the efficiency of conversion, such that sufficient power is available for commercial applications.

In order to achieve the various advantages potentially available with non-thermal solidification methods, one must understand the physical and chemical nature of the polymeric materials involved, and the mechanisms by which these various forms of radiation act on the polymers.

Radiation curing photochemistry is an area of extensive research. One method of improving the curing rate is through increased efficiency of initiators. These are molecules which absorb radiant energy, usually at specific wavelengths, and form chemically reactive free radical molecules. Free radicals, when in the presence of suitable monomers cause a chain reaction which very rapidly converts the monomers into high molecular weight polymers (see Figure 1.2[2]).

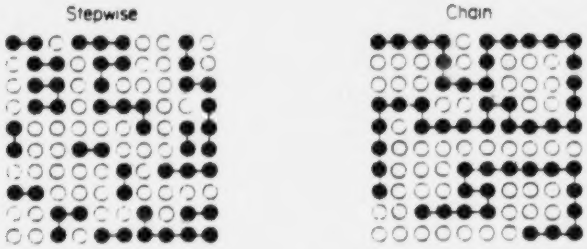

Figure 1.2: In stepwise polymerization, each polymer (●●$_n$) is as reactive as monomer (o). In chain polymerization, each polymer dies and can no longer react with monomer. Only two initiations were required for the chain reaction, 20 for the stepwise.

Design of these systems is specific for each of the types of radiation mentioned above, and must consider the degree of polymerization and level of cross-linking required in the final product.

2. PROCEDURE

A combination of computer and manual literature searches have been conducted. Manual searches through recent issues of trade journals such as Package Printing, Packaging, Paper Film and Foil Converter, and Canadian Packaging have resulted in many articles dealing with radiation processing but at a low technical level. Buyer's guides such as the Thomas Register, Fraser's Guide and the Scott Directory have provided us with a list of companies involved in all aspects of the converting industry. They have been contacted and many have sent brochures describing their product lines.

Computerized literature searches of the Engineering Index and PIRA data bases were successful in turning up 73 articles dealing with radiation curable inks, 72 articles dealing with ultraviolet curable laminates and 28 articles dealing with dielectric laminates. Of these, approximately 50 articles have been ordered from various sources, for further study.

We have also obtained a final report dated June 1986 prepared by Battelle Columbus Division for the Electric Power Research Institute (EPRI) entitled, "Radiation Curing: State-of-the-Art Assessment". This 224 page document is an excellent overview of the radiation curing industry. The index of this volume is attached as Appendix I.

A brief survey of several of Ontario's larger coating and laminating companies was conducted. As the industry is competative and as such often secretive, only generalized questions were asked. A verbal survey met with much resistance and a written survey was attempted, with more success. A copy of the survey is included as Appendix F.

3. THERMAL PROCESSES

The traditional method of drying coatings and laminations is through the use of gas or oil fired thermal ovens. The basic theory is quite simple. The polymers to be coated onto the substrate are suspended in suitable organic solvent or more often, solvent mixtures.

The coated material is passed through the oven where warm air is used to evaporate the solvents, leaving behind the dried polymer coating. Some systems use reactive coatings which contain thermally activated catalysts to aid in the curing. Although the theory is simple, its execution can be quite complex.

Solvent mixtures are used in order to increase the compatibility or solubility of the polymer and to improve the flow characteristics at the coating stage. Formulation of the mixtures is an art which must take several factors besides solubility into account. Initial solvent cost is one such factor.

Complex mixtures of solvents are more difficult to recover. The concentrations of component solvents will change after evaporation and condensation. Unless there is a method for measuring the component concentrations, the solvent cannot be reused in the process and represents an operating cost. The economics of using a single solvent system can be favourable when solvent reuse cost is included.

The energy to evaporate the solvent will depend primarily on the solvent boiling point and its heat of evaporation. Solvents with low boiling points and heats of evaporation are preferred. Water does not fall into this category and is only now becoming more widely used because of recent concern with pollution control regulations. Solvents with very low boiling points, although they may be energy efficient, present problems if they evaporate prematurely. The silk screen printing process was very sensitive to clogging by this form of unwanted drying (see Figures 3.1(3) and 3.2(4)). Inks and coating with such solvents have to be held in sealed containers until they are applied. This makes the cleanup of equipment more difficult and generally involves more controlled and complicated handling equipment.

Once a polymer solvent system has been chosen, the solvent must be removed. The rate of evaporation has a great impact on the nature of the finished product. If the solvent is removed too quickly, a porous product may be the result. If solvent is not removed quickly enough, excessively large dryers will be required and larger volumes of polluted air will have to be treated. Dryer design is of great importance, requiring knowledge of heat transfer, materials chemistry and mechanical engineering. Most large dryer systems have several independently controlled chambers or zones. The preheated zone is used to bring the coating up to temperature. If temperatures are too high in the preheating zone, a phenomena known as skinning may occur. The outer layer of the coating dries quickly and inhibits further drying while underneath, coating retains solvent. The retained solvent may later vaporize and cause blistering. In less severe cases, the finish may remain intact, but the bond to the substrate is poor.

Ink reservoir can be almost totally enclosed, preventing excessive evaporation of solvents.

In the next stage, a large fraction of the solvent is removed and the coating is essentially solidified. The final stages attempt to remove any residual solvents and begin the cooling process. Chilled rollers are often used to complete the cooling to room temperatures. Residual solvent removal becomes more difficult as the concentration driving force for vaporization decreases.

Odor problems may be related to residual solvents left as a result of increasing line speeds to the point where the last stages cannot remove the final solvent traces.

In each of the stages or zones, warm air must be introduced and removed, with a fraction recycled. Air is usually introduced through a nozzle system which is designed to give controlled heat and mass transfer between the air and the coating. Improper nozzle design leads to either a loss in drying efficiency or to disturbances in the coating surface finish.

Recycled air is controlled so that the average residence time of warm air in the drying chamber allows it to pick up an optimum amount of solvent. Often the venting systems use heat exchangers to conserve or recycle heat.

Due to large dryer size, factors such as web tension and edge guiding become more difficult and require more elaborate controls (see Figure 3.3(5)). Also, the undried web must be supported along its length, without ruining the surface finish.

Dryer may be up to 300 ft. long

Although there appear to be many problems associated with the traditional thermal dryer, it has one basic advantage it has been in use for a long time. Most of the problems discussed here have been solved to some extent. The method has been greatly refined, and a large base of expertise exists. The capital costs of a thermal dryer are quite low when compared to capital costs of other methods. The operating costs depend primarily on the cost of fuel, and pollution control systems.

For many applications where particular product characteristics such as gloss are not important, thermal dryers , though crude, can be sufficient. Also, it must be realized that many of these ovens are in operation and are therefore already paid for. Replacement must be economical, for line changeovers.

The experience factor is often difficult to evaluate and can, at best, be included as a risk factor particular to each producer choosing between curing methods.

4. INFRARED (IR)

The distinction between an IR dryer and the traditional thermal or air flow dryers is that the energy is transferred to the coating in a radiant form rather than by convection or conduction. IR comprises that part of the electromagnetic spectrum between 10^{-6}m and 10^{-3}m wavelengths.

IR heaters are broken down into two main groups, those which are gas or oil fired, and those that use electricity. The first group uses heat of combustion to increase the temperature of a solid high enough that it becomes an IR emitter. Electric heaters operate by passing a current through a resistance metal causing them to heat up to a temperature at which IR is emitted. A tungsten filament in an inert atmosphere will also emit IR, as in an ordinary incandescent light bulb. The materials used, such as quart tubes in heaters, are chosen to promote IR emission rather than visible light emission. Work on improving emitter efficiencies is ongoing.

IR radiation is broken down into 3 types; long, medium and short wave. Short wave IR is more penetrating and more easily directed than long wave IR. Long wave IR is more easily scattered by air and is therefore generally less efficient as it is lost as waste heat. Short wave IR is, however, more reflective from highly coloured or pigmented surfaces.

IR is used primarily in a similar fashion to other thermal methods, that is, curing takes place due to solvent removal or due to a thermally activated catalyst. One main advantage of IR is its quicker on/off time. A traditional oven must heat up a relatively large volume of air before it can begin to function. An IR oven need only heat up the emitter material which requires only seconds or minutes. Quick startup and shutdown leads to lower scrap levels which can become

5. ULTRAVIOLET (UV)

Whereas IR and traditional thermal processes are quite similar, UV curing is based on a completely different principle. UV curable inks and coatings have generally a very high solids content consisting of monomers, oligomers, and an initiator. Solvents are not present, making the ink essentially 100% reactive. When exposed to UV energy, the initiators capture it, convert it to chemical energy, and use it to begin chain reaction polymerization. The polymerization reaction is very quick and requires no further external energy input. Common photoinitiators are listed in Table 5.1(7).

The (chain) reactions are terminated in the presence of oxygen or when two reactive ends of polymers join together, or when the monomer has been completely reacted.

Initiation of the reaction is a random event the frequency of which is dependent on the concentration of photoinitiator, the UV intensity or power, and the efficiency with which the photoinitiator absorbs the UV available. Considerable chemical studies have been conducted in the past and refinement of photoinitiator systems is an ongoing process.

The ultimate size of polymer chains and degree of crosslinking between chains is controlled by varying the component concentrations in the ink formula. A greater amount of photoinitiator leads to more numerous, but generally smaller, polymer molecules. Greater amounts of multi-functional monomers leads to a higher degree of crosslinking. Degree of crosslinking, molecular weight distribution and monomer type all affect the coatings' final physical and chemical properties. Commonly used monomers are vinyls, styrenes and acrylates.

The UV inks and coatings industry is a mature industry. It underwent a rapid growth phase in the 1970's, spurred on in large part by the "energy crisis". Printers faced with the threat of rapidly increasing oil and gas prices looked to UV technology as a means to switch to electric energy. The earlier UV inks were more toxic than solvent based systems and much research was aimed at obtaining less toxic substances, and in training personnel in proper handling of the new inks.

The capital outlay of UV equipment is the lowest of all the radiation methods currently used, falling in the $10,000 to $100,000 range. The low cost is due, in part, to the economies of scale as more and more UV applications were realized and, in part, to the relatively simple construction required.

UV lamp shielding is quite simple and directing the UV light onto the substrate can be achieved through reflectors. The two lamp systems with the most commercial success are the conventional electrode and the electrodeless medium pressure mercury arc systems. The medium pressure mercury lamps are moderately priced and have average overall performance characteristics as compared with low pressure mercury, microwave energized mercury and flash or pulsed xenon arc lamps. Operating characteristics of electrode and electrodeless lamps are presented in Table 5.2(8).

In terms of production advantages, UV processes have several other advantages. The inks do not have a tendancy to dry out like solvent based systems. This makes equipment cleanup far easier, and is a major advantage for the screen printing industry where the ink can be exposed to the air for a considerable length of time. The lower volatility of UV inks also helps to minimize explosion hazards. Since UV inks are quick drying, the curing stations are much smaller than previously possible and several colours can be printed one after another with curing between each stage. Presses with up to seven printing stages are not uncommon. An advantage of such a setup is that register between stations can be set once and maintained with very little further adjustment. Also, roll handling is minimized, and scrap generated is minimal as the process is only run once to obtain a finished product. Short startup times for the lamps also contribute to a savings in scrap material as the largest portion of scrap is generated at startup. The small size of the units, less than 30 ft. long, represents a space savings over thermal ovens which can be as much as 300 ft. long.

Although the UV ink cost is typically twice that for solvent based inks on a per gallon basis, the ink cost per area of product produced is approximately equal. This is a direct result of the fact that approximately 50% of the volume of a solvent based ink must be evaporated and does not contribute to the final ink coverage.

UV curing can be typically carried out at 40°C to 90°C. The typical UV lamp will output somewhat less than 50% of the input energy as IR and convected heat. This allows for printing and coating of a greater range of thermally sensitive substrates, not possible with traditional thermal ovens which operate at above 130°C.

The almost instant UV ink cure gives them a surface glossiness or wet look not obtainable by older printing methods. This high gloss is coupled with durability and scuff resistance and makes UV printing ideal for many packaging applications. Gloss is equated with quality and is valuable from the marketing viewpoint.

The major UV ink disadvantage is that highly pigmented coatings are difficult to cure. Recent advances in this area include the use of 2-chlorothioxanthone/amine or chloromethyl (or sulfonylchloride) derivatives of polynuclear aromatic ketones as the photoinitiator system. Table 5.3(9) shows opaque basecoat formulations used in the wood coating industry.

Another limitation of UV curable coatings is that heavy laydowns are difficult to cure. This is as a result of the poorer penetration of UV into the coating. Also cited in the literature is the poor flowout of UV inks from gravure rolls. Viscosity, pigment content, and cure rate are all interrelated factors. A factor of lesser importance is the difficulty associated with de-inking paper which has been printed with the more chemically resistant UV inks.

Since UV printing is a relatively new process, printers and converters are aware of the initial problems experienced with UV inks. Press and roll compatibility, ink toxicity and slow cure rates of pigmented systems are becoming less and less real problems and more and more perceived problems. Perceived problems do, however, inhibit the industry's growth and the growth rate of UV curing "is slowing down and is not expected to show any dramatic upturn unless the prices of essential chemical materials used go down to a great extent"(10).

6. ELECTRON BEAM (EB)

EB technology is not as mature as IR and UV technology, and it is still in its growtn stage. UV and IR installations number in the thousands in the Unted States while EB units only number in the hundreds. Approximately 200 EB units had been delivered as of September '85 by Energy Sciences International (E.S.I.), a recognized leader in the EB equipment field.

The basic components common to all EB units are; 1. power supply, 2. electron source, 3. electron accelerator, 4. vacuum chamber, 5. output window. The units must have extensive shielding for two reasons. The electron beam itself is very penetrating and the electron accelerator acts as an x-ray source resulting from scattered electrons.

The polymerization chemistry is different from that for UV systems. The high energy electrons interact directly with the uncured coatings' organic molecules to break chemical bonds and form free radicals. These free radicals then initiate chain reactions to polymerize available monomers, and oligomers or they can recombine with other free radicals to form crosslinked molecules. Crosslinking yields a more rigid and more chemically resistant polymer often with improved thermal properties. As with UV induced free radical polymerization, the chain reaction can be stopped in the presence of oxygen or low molecular weight free radicals.

High energy electrons can cause chain scission in large molecular weight molecules. If the resulting free radicals do not have the opportunity to rejoin or propagate, the end result is a decrease in molecular weight with a corresponding decrease in performance. Therefore it is important to discover the optimum conditions and radiation dosages which will bring about the required characteristics in each product. Inclusion of multi-functional monomers or oligomers can promote crosslinking at lower radiation dosages and consequently less chain scission. One such technology uses free radical addition to a thiol, (a type of sulfur containing organic molecule). The polyene-polythiol systems which result have many sites at which free radical initiators can be used to enhance crosslinking.

Two types of EB units exist, the scanning or swept beam unit and the linear or planar cathode unit (see Figure 6.1(11)).

The swept beam type is larger and requires considerably more shielding as the entire length of the accelerator must be shielded. System efficiencies of 40 to 50 percent can be expected from the Dynamitron or Insulated-Core-Transformer swept beam types. Dose rates of from 1 to 10 Mrads/s can be achieved with scanning widths of 61 to 183cm. Penetrations of 10 to 15cm are possible. The penetrative ablility of the units allows curing of very thick substrates.

The planar cathode type produces electrons from a filament oriented along the axis of symmetry of the system. A cylindrical electron gun directs the beam at the substrate. The shielded volume is less as the electrons are generated along the entire web width. The units can be designed in modular form, allowing for expansion to any web width. To increase the dose delivered to the substrate, or to enable greater line speeds, the units can be placed in series. The energy dose rates are lower than with swept beam units, however, doses of 3 Mrad at line speeds of 300m/min are possible. Figure 6.2(13) shows the performance characteristics of a 72 in. EB unit, relating the current, line speed, and dose of a particular Energy Sciences unit.

The relationship between dose, current and line speed can be utilized to the processor's advantage. Once a dose level has been set, a feedback system can be used which varies the current to instantly account for small changes in line speed. This enables an even, uniform curing of the product not often obtained with traditional drying methods (see Figure 6.3(13)).

EB processing is conducted at ambient temperatures which is an improvement over UV processing. Curing of offset lithographic inks on Tetra Brik^R packaging and the Duracure^{TM} process for magnetic tapes are examples. Since the substrate temperature is not significantly increased, the moisture level of paper as substrate can be maintained. This improves the lay flat and reduces curl and eliminates the need for a remoisturization stage in the process.

High gloss can be achieved in different ways with EB processes. As with UV, the wet look can be obtained due to the quick EB cure. The penetrative power of EB has brought about a new process called transfer metallization. A high quality polyester film is metallized in a separate operation. This film is then laminated to paper which has been pattern coated with an EB curable adhesive. The adhesive is cured through the polyester and metallizing which is subsequently stripped off and reused. The transferred metal retains the gloss of the polyester. The result is a high gloss metallized paper which is highly valued by the greeting card industry and packagers of quality cosmetics and liquor products. The process can be used to metalize bulky or thick substrates which cannot be vacuum metallized economically.

A third method for achieving high gloss is through EB drum transfer. A highly polished chromed drum replaces the polyester film. The wet coating is nipped onto the drum, cured, and stripped off. The problems of handling and reusing the polyester film are eliminated. The major use for this process is in the specialty and photographic papers industry.

The major disadvantage of EB curing is its high initial capital costs. A typical unit costs from $300,000 to $500,000. The production rates must be very high and the value added significant to amortize this type of investment. Energy Sciences Inc. has provided numerous cost comparison sheets between EB and other curing methods (see Tables 6.1, 6.2 and 6.3). A common feature of these analyses is that the rate of production is increased with EB units. Thus the increased capital costs are spread out over more product. It is the low production rates which have kept EB out of the screen printing market.

Another common point in the examples is that the lines are dedicated to one product, notably the 90% utilization quoted in Table 6.1. Our own observations of the Canadian market are that many converters are not running at their available capacity now. Therefore, the prospect of increased capacity is not as attractive as might be thought.

Energy Sciences marketers openly admit that EB curing has only caught on industry wide in the magnetic tape media industry and to a lesser extent in the silicone release paper industry. "Almost all other applications are specialty or niche products where the advantage is specific to the company involved because of its manufacturing and distribution technique or unique end use, and these are not necessarily industry wide factors".(14) It is an indication that this new technology is catching the eyes of specific types of companies rather than all companies in a particular industry.

7. MICROWAVE

Microwave curing of polymers is still in its early developmental stages. With the increase in popularity of the home microwave oven, it is common knowledge that microwaves can be used to heat up water molecules. What is not commonly known is that microwaves also heat up fats, sugars and other compounds with varying efficiencies. A common falacy about microwaves is that they heat "from the inside out". They, in fact, only penetrate foodstuffs to a depth of approximately 2cm. The heat generated in the outer 2cm of the food cooks the inner portions by the traditional conductive or convective mechanisms. The real value of microwave cooking is the bulk heating effect which, for the comparatively thin films involved with laminations, gives only a minor advantage over other thermal methods. Information dealing specifically with microwave curing of coatings and laminates was not found in the literature searches. Three articles dealing with industrial applications of microwaves are referenced below.(15,16,17)

The general lack of information on the use of microwaves for coating and laminating is an indication that there is still much more basic research to be carried out in the development of products which would benefit from microwave technology. A novel product idea or perceived need must be realized, and applied, using existing materials and methods or novel materials must be obtained and matched to products.

8. CONCLUSIONS AND DISCUSSION

The information provided in the preceding sections describes each of the radiation curing methods in general terms, pointing out common advantages and disadvantages of each. Large coating and laminating production lines are custom made machines. The component parts are partially standardized in design, but there are wide variations in the size and level of sophistication for unwinds, rewinds, slitters, coating stations and control systems. This customization extends to the curing systems as well.

Apart from the consideration that each individual coating and laminating line is unique, the technical information in this report can be applied to the Ontario situation as well as to the U.S. situation from which it has been drawn.

One general principle which applies to all coating and laminating systems is that increased specialization leads to greater efficiency. The more different tasks a machine is required to perform, the less efficient it will be at any one task. Thus, as the Energy Science data shows, an EB curing unit can be more cost efficient than a thermal oven, but such a unit is generally less flexible. EB curables tend to be designed for and applied to specific products, whereas thermal ovens have been the workhorse of the coatings industry for many years and can be used for a wide variety of products.

"As long as there is an abundant supply of fossil fuel, the coating industry will continue to finish products in which there is no value added or manufacturing advantage other than energy savings, by conventional thermal cure methods".(18)

18. Industrial Review on Energy, SCM-Glidden Chemical Coating, Cleveland, Ohio, 1977

The real advantage for any company wishing to invest in the new radiation curing technology is the novel, high value added products which are possible. Materials and equipment suppliers should be consulted early on if a decision to enter into the radiation curing technology fields is to be made.

"The equipment will only cure specifically formulated products and the materials are specifically designed to be cured by a radiation source. One cannot exist without the other. The suppliers have a lot to offer to any new end users. They have the technical skills, and they know the limitations of the technology. The equipment suppliers have installations specifically for the use of end users. Any potential end user ought to make the small investment in time in becoming familiar with the radiation curing process, its costs, its advantages, and even trying it out. No equipment investment is required until a product is developed".(19)

Energy Sciences operates pilot facilities in Woburn (Massachusetts), and Geneva and Tokyo at which potential customers can evaluate the EB systems offered. Such facilities are common among the large manufacturers of converting equipment. They serve as promotional aids, training centers for operators and pilot machines for new product development. We are also lead to believe that pilot sized machines are often used in industry to reclaim unsatisfactory or off spec materials more economically than production machines.

Figures on energy efficiency of radiation curing must be looked at very carefully on a case to case basis. The energy input by UV and EB curing is that which is required to initiate a chain reaction. The reaction procedes on the basis of potential chemical energy stored in the monomer molecules. This stored energy is partially reflected in the higher prices of EB and UV curable systems. One must be careful to realize that it is possible that the total energy consumption has not been decreased, but has been shifted to another site or stage of the overall process.

From a business point of view, energy consumption is just another cost of production. Therefore, if to save on energy costs a producer must use more expensive materials, the final choice will be made on the basis of which system yields the lowest overall cost. Of course, lack of full fuel availability such as was experienced in the 1970's, forced many industries, especially the printing industry, to quickly evaluate radiation processing techniques. They soon discovered many additional benefits (production speed, product quality, value added products, etc.) besides energy savings; these additional factors became the driving force for increasing the growth rate of radiation processing of polymeric materails for a wide variety of other industrial applications.(20)

Over the course of this study, energy and other cost factors specific to the Ontario region were sought, with very little success. The pricing structures for gas and electricity are based on location, type of service and amount of energy consumed. In conjunction with this, the size variation of coverting companies, and indeed the differences in capacities of individual machines, makes the task of determining specific costs for a region such as Ontario pointless. An attempt to directly survey the Ontario industry was made.

"The goal of most users is to establish a proprietary position in their industry using this technology. A lot of development work and some radiation curing applications are being kept very secret by end users. This is one reason for the difficulty in forecasting usage of this technology. Because of the degree of competition between equipment manufacturers as well as material suppliers, their dollar and product volumes are regarded as proprietary information. All of the secrecy makes it difficult to assess market size".(19)

The results of our telephone survey to Ontario converters and materials suppliers confirmed the above statement. At the time of writing this report, the results of a written survey have been completed (See Appendices F & G), but the response to questions dealing with plant capacities was very poor. In response to some of the more general questions, we learned that converters would prefer to "stick to what they know best". Indications are that converters would only respond to the new technology if pressed by buyers requiring the special features of radiation cured products. It was also noted that Canadian converters had to, for the most part, follow foreign leads, mainly the United States, as the markets in Canada are not large enough to support a separate industry.

In any given situation the decision of whether to use Radiation Curing methods must be made on the specifics of the case. Tables of general characteristics are useful mainly for eliminating technologies which are grossly unsuited for a particular task. Such a table is included as Appendix H of this report.

The overall future for radiation curing methods is good and virtually all those papers dealing with the marketing aspects predict growth rates slightly better than for the general economy. Radiation cured products will carve out a market niche and new products will be continually developed. It will not, in the foreseeable future, replace the traditional thermal methods now in use. More stringent regulations for pollution control, and rising costs for oil and gas, in relation to electricity, will ensure that radiation cured polymers will maintain a growing, secure market share.

Copy of Written Survey Form and Covering Letter

The Ontario Research Foundation has been commissioned by the Ontario Ministry of Energy to establish the current state-of-the-art curing techniques presently in use in the converting and printing industry within Ontario. The Packaging Technologies Group of ORF has generated the attached questionnaire in order to survey the industry on their radiation curing capability. All information obtained will be treated as confidential. Only the names of the organizations participating will be published in the final report. ORF will furnish this report upon request to any participant. All questionnaires will be destroyed upon compleiton of the report.

We realize the sensitivity of many of the questions and if you are reluctant to answer any or all, please return the form to enable us to appraise the survey on its total merit. We would also appreciate your response as soon as possible, hopefully no later than Friday, 28 November 1986.

Thank you for your co-operation on this project.

RADIATION CURING CAPABILITY SURVEY

Packaging Technologies Group, Ontario Research Foundation

1. Company Name: ____

2. Majority ownership: Canadian ☐, foreign ☐, public ☐, private ☐

3. No. of Branches: none ☐, 1-3 ☐, 4-6 ☐, more than 6 ☐

4. Total no. of Employees: 1-50 ☐, 51-100 ☐, 100-300 ☐ more than 300 ☐

5. Do you use non-thermal drying or curing techniques? yes ☐ no ☐

6. Type of non-thermal units in use:
   EB ☐, UV ☐, IR ☐, Microwave ☐
   Corona Treatment ☐, Other ☐

7. Was energy consumption or savings a major ☐ or minor ☐ factor when purchasing non-thermal units?

8. Was the non-thermal unit obtained as part of a new line ☐ or retrofitted to existing equipment ☐?

9. Have you been satisfied with the non-thermal unit performance in terms of:
   a) Economics: Yes ☐, No ☐
   b) Technical performance, service, etc.: Yes☐, No ☐

10. Are you planning any near future expansions to include purchasing non-thermal type equipment? Yes ☐ No ☐

11. Type of thermal units in use: Gas ☐, Electric ☐

12. How many converting or printing lines are you presently running? _____

13. Percentage of capacity? _____%

14: What is the overall plant capacity in terms of monthly or yearly production? _______

15. About the person completing this survey.

    Name ______________________________ Title ________________________
    Years with this company _________ In the packaging industry _________
    Current area of responsibility:
    Administration ☐, Production ☐, Engineering ☐,
    Marketing/Sales ☐, Science/Technology ☐
    Science/Technology - R&D ☐

16. Would you like to receive a free copy of the final report to the Ontario Ministry of Energy?
    Yes ☐ No ☐

APPENDIX G

Survey Results

Radiation Curing Capability Survey

Procedure

A total of 75 survey forms were sent out to a select group of companies in the converting industry. The survey was addressed primarily to plant managers as it was felt this group would possess the technical background and would be at a high enough management level to be aware of overall trends. To the date of this writing, 21 responses have been received (approximately 30% return).

Summary of Responses

- The size distribution of responding companies

Size	1-150	51-100	101-300	>300
No.	10	4	4	3

slightly more than half of responding companies have greater than 50 employees.

- Only 2 companies responding, indicated majority foreign ownership.

- less than 50% of those responding do currently use radiation curing techniques.

- Of those companies which do have non-thermal units,
  a) none considered energy consumption a major purchasing factor
  b) 8 use U.V.
     3 use IR
     3 use Corona (as a pre-treatment)
     1 uses EB
     0 use microwaves

c) Only two companies indicated that they were not satisfied with the economics and technical aspects of their non-thermal units. Both were, however, planning expansion.

d) Only two companies which do have non-thermal units are not planning expansion

- Only one company which does not have non-thermal units is planning expansion into this area.

- Questions dealing with plant capacity were poorly answered, and in some cases an indication that the information was proporietary was written in.

- From the answers received, indications are that the industry has in place, considerable excess capacity, on the order of 40%.

- The individuals filling in the survey represented all areas of responsibility, the majority being responsible for more than 1 area. The number of years in the packaging industry ranged from 2 to 37 years with an average of 16 years.

Conclusions and Discussion

The response to the survey was good, and the experience level of respondents high such that some general comments can be made with a reasonable degree of confidence.

Those companies using non-thermal technologies are, in general, satisified with its performance and are contemplating expansion. Companies not currently using the technology are skeptical and are not planning to enter into this area. This attitude results in slow growth for these technologies.

One point which was confirmed by the survey is that of the non-thermal technologies available, UV has made the greatest inroads with industry. It is a mature technology. Infra red also falls into this category. EB, on the other hand, still has much growth potential. We did not identify any companies using microwave technology which indicates that it is still in its early development stages. As such, it holds the greatest potential for innovation, and likely the highest risk factors.

In verbal interviews with some respondents, the opinion that Canadian industry is a follower was expressed. It was observed that because of its small size, the Canadian industry could not support, by itself, a separate set of material suppliers. Therefore, unless for example, electron beam technology is used in the United States, the background structures, specialty formulators, etc. required for its use in Canada will not exist.

Any future developments must consider the world market if they are to succeed.

APPENDIX H

General Characteristics of Various Curing Techniques

Characteristics of Various Curing Techniques

	Advantages	Disadvantages
Thermal	- low capital costs - good historical background information is available (established technology) - versatility	- high fuel costs - volatile emissions require recovery systems - limitations on product characteristics such as gloss, curl, temperature sensitivity. - large space requirements
IR	- quicker on-off times than thermal - lower explosion hazards than gas fired ovens - better control than with thermal ovens (often used as a preheating stage where control is more critical)	- coatings, etc. cure by solvent drying and thermally activated catalytic additives - thermally sensitive substrates cannot be used - no advantages in terms of novel product characteristics
UV	- low capital costs allow its use with low volume products - instant on-off capability - novel product features such as high gloss, scuff resistance - higher production speeds possible with quick cure substrates - 100% solids coatings eliminate volatile emissions - elimination of solvents reduces explosion hazards - is an established technology especially in the printing industry - larger range of temperature sensitive substrates can be used than for IR and thermal processes - shielding relatively simple (low hazard) - ink cleanup easier	- poor penetration of highly pigmented coatings - 100% solids coatings may have residual monomers entrapped which may pose health hazards for food applications - uncured inks, etc. are chemically active and may be skin irritants - ink costs generally higher, but this may be offset by better coverages per gallon - heavy laydowns difficult to obtain

EB	- very penetrating energy - quick curing rates allow higher production speeds - novel products can be produced, high gloss, curing through impermeable substrates - curing is at essentially ambient temperatures - space requirements are small	- high capital costs limit it to high volume or high value products - extensive shielding for x-rays required - relatively new technology industry often reluctant to invest in unknown areas
Microwave	- very penetrating energy - allows for bulk heating - good area for development as it has been largely unexplored	- a largely unexplored energy source for coating and laminations industry - bulk heating not generally a factor for thin films - technolgy is relatively expensive
